Abstract

Since the Renaissance, French language has developed in parallel to the formation of the French nation. The early development of the whole of France geographically into a nation distinguishes France from the other countries, notably in its politics regarding regional languages. Influenced by the fluctuations of history and human institutions, French language has varied from one period to another, and even more distinctly, from region to region. If there is a discipline that links the history of languages in France, it is geography. In 1992, the Second Article of the Constitution defined French as the language of the French Republic. Yet, regional languages are still recognised and celebrated in the same way monuments, works of art and political history symbolise cultural plurality of which languages are conveyors par excellence.
